Write an introduction to an informative and factual blog post titled "How Facebook Can Help You Escape The Cubicle". The increasingly popular social media platform Facebook has been found to be able to help people escape the drudgery of cubicle life. Suadah's job was dull and lifeless – just like the cubicle she sat at for eight hours a day – five days a week. She would log into Facebook to mingle with her friends and see how their day was going. Suadah was not there to interact with people, however, as she had been instructed never to talk about work at home. She used Facebook as a way to escape from her daily routine of answering calls from IRS department employees who had been audited and were trying to plead their case. "I couldn't even get a few minutes of peace at home, so the only time I was able to relax and think straight was when I logged onto Facebook, even if all I was doing was reading status updates," Suadah said. "It definitely helps to get away from the real world for a few minutes and enter into another one that is free of work and obligations." Suadah is not alone in her opinions about Facebook helping her to escape the boredom of cubicle life. Matt B., who also works in an office tower under fluorescent lights, enjoys Facebook as well. "The social network has become a great way to pass the time at work," Matt B. said. "It's amazing how an addicting site like Facebook can provide hours of entertainment without you having to spend any money or leave your desk." Although Facebook can be used as an escape from drudgery, it is not without its downfalls. For example, studies have shown that it causes people to be less productive at work because they are addicted to the site. Pretending to be busy on Facebook causes workers to neglect their actual work and prevents them from getting important tasks completed. Desperate to escape the drudgery of their cubicle, many Americans are attracted to the idea of Facebook. It is an easy way to do so, until you become addicted. Then, your job experience becomes even worse than it already is.

FLASH describes itself as "a middle-level English language text designed for teacher training institutions" and discusses the concept of "flash fiction", or short-length fiction written in English, as an object of study.
